

Former CIA analyst: Western intelligence may be behind mosque bombing

February 28, 2006 - 0:0

International

Former CIA analyst and presidential advisor Ray McGovern does not rule out Western involvement in this week's Askariya mosque bombing in light of previous false flag operations that have advanced hidden agendas of the ruling elite.

During the mid-eighties, McGovern was one of the senior analysts conducting early morning briefings of the PDB one-on-one with the vice president, the secretaries of state and defense, the chairman of the Joint Chiefs, and the assistant to the president for national security affairs.

He joined Alex Jones to discuss many topics from martial law to government false flag terrorism and provocation tactics.

McGovern firstly suggested that Posse Comitatus, the law that forbids the military to take on a policing role within the U.S., is being systematically overthrown.

"Not only have the top ranks of the intelligence community been politicized and corrupted, so has the army. The military establishment is goose-stepping around, saluting the president and saying whatever the president wants them to."

A former officer himself, McGovern declared that the unprecedented movement towards a martial law mentality within government and military is deeply unsettling and that the U.S. is hurtling toward a dictatorship.

"As I look at the top Pentagon brass, I have to conclude that unlike my days as a U.S. army officer, those folks have been so politicized that if the U.S. president told them to go ahead and exercise police functions in this country, they would go ahead and salute and they would do it, and that's really scary."

Moving on to the "war on terror", 27-year veteran McGovern concurred that staged terror has long been used by U.S. governments in order to forward their own agendas at home and elsewhere:

"There's lots of evidence that the government in the past has used these things for its own purposes, for overthrowing governments, as it did in Iran in 1953, and in Guatemala in 1954, the Gulf of Tonkin was a little different... LBJ did deceive Congress and the war went on for seven years."

Concerning 9/11, McGovern declared that although he is still of two minds, he is deeply suspicious of the official version of events and "there is certainly a cover up." The amount of unanswered questions and blatant lies told by Cheney and the neocons makes it very easy for him to believe the government was involved. Moving on to the recent Askariya mosque bombing in Samarra, Iraq, McGovern commented: "The main question is Qui Bono? Who benefits from this kind of thing? You don't have to be very conspiratorial or even paranoid to suggest that there are a whole bunch of likely suspects out there and not only the Sunnis. You know, the British officers were arrested, dressed up in Arab garb, riding around in a car, so this stuff goes on."

(Source: Prison Planet)